

“A New Respect for Science”

New York Times, 12/22/08

By following established law and sound science, President Obama and EPA Administrator Lisa Jackson are living up to the promise of changing the way Washington works. Two years after the Supreme Court ordered the EPA to determine if global warming pollution was threatening public health — a fact supported by a worldwide scientific consensus — the President and Administrator Jackson are putting the government on the side of the facts. With this proposed finding, they are living up to their commitment to follow science and law to protect public health. And they've taken a big step toward moving America to a clean-energy future that creates new jobs.

Respect for Science + Respect for Law = Stronger America

Thank you, Mr. President.

Thank you, Administrator Jackson.
